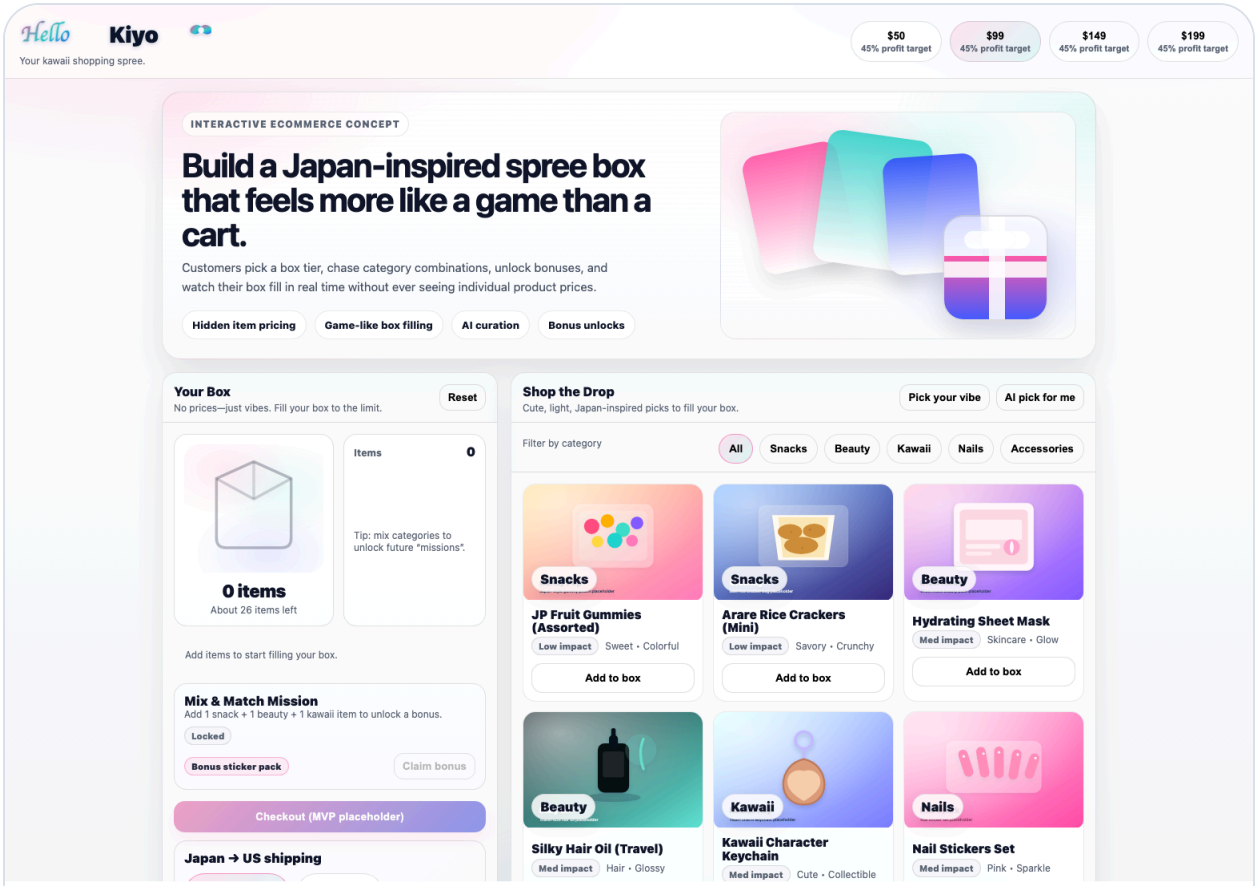
> The short version: HelloKiyo is an ecommerce brand where customers build a cute Japan-inspired box of products. Instead of shopping with a normal cart, they fill a box, unlock bonuses, and enjoy a game-like experience.

1. What is HelloKiyo?

HelloKiyo is a brand that sells fixed-price boxes filled with Japanese snacks, beauty products, nails, accessories, and other cute items. The customer does not shop by comparing individual prices. Instead, she chooses a box size, fills it with items she likes, and watches the box fill up visually.

This matters because normal ecommerce feels practical, but HelloKiyo is supposed to feel fun, exciting, and shareable. It should feel more like a shopping game or a “treat yourself” moment than a normal checkout flow.



2. Why this is different

Most stores ask the customer to do work: search, compare prices, think about shipping, and build a cart. HelloKiyo turns that into a playful experience.

- The customer sees a box fill up, not a spreadsheet-like cart.
- There can be missions or combo goals that unlock bonus items.
- The site can offer "AI pick for me" curation for a fun shortcut.
- The final result feels giftable, cute, and social-media friendly.

3. How it works

1. Customer picks a box tier: $50, $99, $149, or $199.
2. Customer adds items she likes.
3. The site shows the box filling up visually.
4. The site estimates how many more items can fit.
5. The customer checks out one box, not a list of item prices.

4. Who is this for?

5. Why customers may love it

The first target customer is a girl or young woman who likes cute design, Japanese culture, snacks, beauty, nails, accessories, and “haul” or “unboxing” style content online.

She is not only buying products. She is buying a feeling: “I made this,” “this is cute,” “this feels like a shopping spree,” and “I want to show this to my friends.”

Good ecommerce usually solves a practical problem. Great brands also create excitement. HelloKiyo can stand out because it mixes shopping, surprise, curation, and social-friendly presentation.

If the experience is strong enough, the customer may come back not only for products, but for the fun of building the next box.

6. How the business makes money

The business sells a fixed-price box. Inside the company, there is a cost ceiling that decides how much product cost and shipping cost can fit inside that box while still protecting profit.

> Simple example: if a $99 box targets roughly 45% gross profit, product cost and shipping cost together should stay below roughly 55% of the sale. That leaves room for packaging, fees, operations, and profit.

What the customer sees

- A fixed box price
- A fun box-filling visual
- Optional faster shipping
- A bonus or mission system

What the business tracks

- Supplier product cost
- Japan-to-US shipping cost
- Packaging cost
- Payment fees
- Gross profit by box tier

7. Go-to-market plan

TIME	MAIN FOCUS
0-30 days	Finish storefront, test first orders, collect feedback from friends and early customers.
30-90 days	Launch paid boxes, improve repeat purchase rate, refine product mix, improve content.
3-6 months	Make sourcing and fulfillment smoother, improve analytics, add more refined missions and curation.
6-12 months	Scale content, expand product range, and pursue sponsorships or creator partnerships.

8. Marketing plan

Kiyo is part of the brand story, which is powerful. The marketing engine should start with short-form content: unboxings, “fill a box with me,” favorite products, challenge videos, and themed drops.

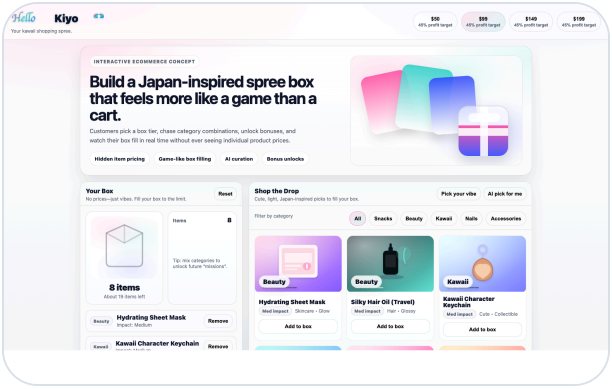
9. Operations plan

Shopify handles orders and payments. A simple ops layer tracks what went in each box, what it actually cost, and how the order moves from review to packing to shipping.

This helps in three ways:

- It gives people a reason to discover the brand.
- It makes the box experience easy to understand.
- It can attract sponsors and free products later.

Early on, this can be simple. Over time, it should become more automated so the business can grow without becoming messy.



10. Why this could become more than a store

HelloKiyo can become more than ecommerce if it succeeds in three connected areas:

- Product sales: profitable box purchases.
- Content growth: a real audience that likes the brand.
- Sponsorships: brands paying to be featured once the audience is large enough.

That matters because it creates multiple value engines instead of just “sell item, ship item, repeat.”

11. What funding would help with

CATEGORY	WHY IT MATTERS
Inventory	Lets the business stock attractive starter products and ship faster.
Packaging	Makes the unboxing experience feel premium and worth sharing online.
Store and ops	Improves order tracking, analytics, checkout flow, and fulfillment.
Content and testing	Helps prove what content converts and what product mix performs best.

12. Main risks and the plan to handle them

RISK	PLAN
Supplier prices change	Use conservative estimates and update the box math often.
Shipping costs move around	Default to economical shipping and keep a margin buffer.
Products go out of stock	Use substitution rules and maintain backups by category.
Shoppers get confused	Keep the interface visual, simple, and fun.
Growth is slower than expected	Start lean, test content quickly, and improve conversion before spending big on ads.

13. Closing idea

HelloKiyo has a strong beginner story: make shopping feel exciting, make the box experience easy to understand, keep the profit math disciplined, and build a brand that can grow through content.

If the team proves that customers enjoy the experience and the business can ship profitably, HelloKiyo can grow from a fun box concept into a real ecommerce and creator-led brand.
